

ANDALUSIA, SPAIN

CORDOBA, APRIL 28 - 30, 2013

More From Cordoba...

Cordoba is noted, among many things, for court yards. You walk down the narrow streets and through many of the doorways there will be these open courtyards. If one did not know to look for them, most would be missed. Many of them are court yards to small hotels in the area we stayed in. But all though the city, the general architecture of most blocks includes these court yards, be it private apartments, government buildings, private residences similar to our condos, restaurants, or hotels / motels.

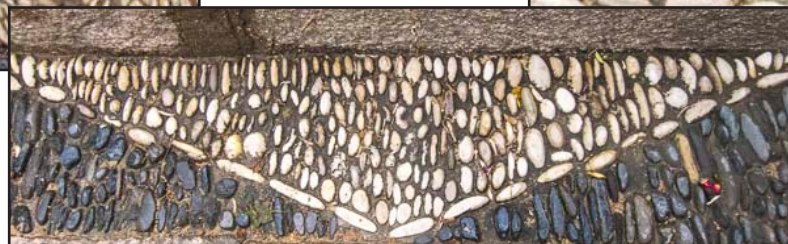

There are special times of the year when some of the more spectacular court yards that are decorated with flowers and plants are open to the public (for a fee of course). We just happened to be there during one of these times, (albeit when the weather was overcast and rainy). It was still very interesting regardless of the less than optimum weather conditions.

In Cordoba I noticed all these street, walkway and court yard designs created by rocks. The rocks were all very similar in size and shape and either light or dark. Some of the designs were pretty complex considering how basic and uniform the shape of the elements making up the overall design were.

.END